BACKGROUND

Bangladesh's dairy industry is gradually shifting from a traditional smallholder system to a more organized and technology-driven sector, though it is still developing. The country produces around 13–14 million metric tons of milk annually, but demand continues to exceed supply due to population growth, urbanization, and rising income levels. Over 80% of farms remain small-scale with low productivity, mainly due to limited access to quality breeds, feed, and modern farming practices. However, leading processors are strengthening the sector through improved collection networks, chilling facilities, and cold-chain systems.

The industry is seeing growing demand for processed dairy products such as packaged milk, yogurt, and cheese, supported by government initiatives and technological adoption. Emerging smart dairy solutions—such as automated milking, herd management systems, and digital payments—are improving efficiency and transparency. Despite challenges like high feed costs and infrastructure gaps, the sector offers strong opportunities in precision farming, value-added products, and dairy-tech, making it a promising market for future investment and growth.
